FEATURED STORY

School of Medicine receives classroom audiovisual upgrades

By Zachary McPherson, Lead Communication Technologies Engineer

The Li Ka Shing Center classrooms are receiving a comprehensive audiovisual overhaul. New high-definition cameras with auto tracking capabilities will deliver sharper, more immersive lecture captures and seamless remote participation. At the same time, upgraded microphones and speakers will ensure every voice in the room — whether in-person or online — is heard clearly, eliminating distractions and fostering better engagement.

To simplify your teaching experience, we're also installing an updated lectern with an intuitive control system that lets you power up and manage all AV equipment in seconds, freeing you to focus on instruction rather than technology. These enhancements will not only improve day-to-day reliability but also position our classrooms for future innovations in hybrid and active-learning formats.

We are pleased to announce that beginning this fall, the Stanford School of Medicine will undertake a series of classroom technology upgrades aimed at enhancing the learning environment and supporting evolving instructional needs.

These improvements are part of our continued commitment to providing state-of-the-art facilities that foster effective teaching, learning, and collaboration. We appreciate your patience and flexibility during the implementation period and will provide additional updates, including any temporary room closures or scheduling changes, as the project progresses.

Please reach out to the TDS SOM AV Team for any questions about the upgrades.
